automobiles, tractors, combines, skid-steer loaders and forklifts.

“Carbon monoxide levels are dangerous even if they are low enough to not displace oxygen,” Ricketts said. “A carbon monoxide detector is the only way to know when levels are dangerous.”

Early warning signs of carbon monoxide poisoning may include:

- Dizziness.
- Nausea.
- Sleepiness.
- Headache.
- Tightness or pain in the chest.

Ricketts said those exposed to high levels of carbon monoxide should see a doctor immediately. If a person collapses and carbon monoxide is suspected, call 911.

He adds that to protect yourself and others, proper maintenance of equipment and providing outdoor venting can reduce risk. Carbon monoxide detectors should be installed if fuel-burning equipment is used indoors to prevent hazardous exposure.

“Carbon monoxide detectors should be installed in everyone’s home,” Ricketts said.

“If equipment that produces carbon monoxide is used in the garage or a shop, then a detector should be installed in there.”

More information on respiratory hazards is available at local extension offices in Kansas.
