The virus is spreading to flocks as migratory birds fly south for the winter, said Yuko Sato, a poultry extension veterinarian at the Iowa State University Veterinary Diagnostic Lab. But the new strain in cows makes the situation different from previous years.

“Instead of just migratory birds being a potential source of the infection, now we also have to worry about potential interactions with infected dairy herds that could potentially transmit the virus to domestic poultry,” she said.

The virus has an extremely high fatality rate in birds. Many birds die within a day or two - so when bird flu is confirmed on a farm, it affects the entire flock.

“Essentially, all of the birds that’s on that site will be depopulated, meaning they’ll all be put down, in order to control the virus and to make sure it’s contained in one area to not spread to other premises,” Sato said.

Outbreaks are particularly hitting the middle of the U.S. hard, because there are a lot of large egg producers, Thompson said. Iowa, Ohio and Indiana produce the highest volume of eggs in the country, according to the USDA.

“The disease specifically has stuck around in the Midwest,” Thompson said. “And part of that is a bit of climate, a bit where wild bird migratory patterns have gone through. And so they’ve been disproportionately affected.”

Producers will be hatching more chicks to make up for the losses, Thompson said. But it’s difficult to know for sure how bad the disease will be, and it’s expensive to keep too many birds.

“Everybody’s trying to find the best solution to mitigate disease impacts and maintain profitability,” Thompson said.

“Because if egg prices are high, we don’t buy as many eggs . . . they still need to sell their eggs, so this is an issue for both producers and consumers.”

Thompson expects egg prices will fall again as there are fewer bird flu cases and the egg supply recovers. But more outbreaks of the virus could push prices back up.

“We’ll have to keep an eye on how many outbreaks there are and where those are happening,” she said.

Genesis Gives Us Identity

Since the fall into sin, humanity has struggled with an identity crisis. The purpose and ways in which we are to care for others is obstructed by the breakdown of relationships with creation and each other (Gen 3). All of which fell into confusion which continues today.

Gender, sexuality, positions, occupations, responsibilities, and the like are the result of our identity crisis at the Fall. Our identity crisis before God.

Even before the fall, Genesis teaches us who we are: “So God created man in His own image, in the image of God He created him; male and female he created them” (Gen 1:27, ESV).

We are created in the image of God. We were created to care for others. We were created to create. We were created male and female. We were created to know what is good and right. We were created to be good and right and have this forever.

But we are created. We have limits. We cannot handle both good and evil and remain good in word and deed. We cannot grow fins like a fish. We cannot grow wings like a bird. We create and imitate God’s creation, but we cannot become them nor they us.

For God has set aside human creatures as different, made in His image to care for all other creatures.

And so God has come to restore us in His eyes. In Jesus, we find God in the image of God. In Jesus, the image of God is fully restored to man, both male and female.

In Jesus, our identity before God is resolved. In Jesus, all identity crises find their end. God restores us to Himself in Jesus so that we are His children made in His image through Jesus.
