fatalities, and we don't want those things to happen," Spencer said.

Also in support is the American Trucking Association, which blamed the 2016 guidance document for a lack of enforcement.

While trucking groups have raised concerns over road safety in recent years, Belzer said it's difficult to know if these new English proficiency standards will actually prevent accidents. He said better work conditions, such as overtime pay, are more likely to improve road safety compared to stricter language standards.

"If it causes wages to rise, then maybe it would make it more safe and more secure and more productive," he said.

Truck driver Miguel Morales said that English is crucial to the job, but more in-depth entry level training would be better. Morales, who was born in Chile and is now based out of Houston, Tex., said both language proficiency and higher training standards would make roads safer.

Raman Dhillon is the CEO of the North American Punjabi Trucking Association, which represents about 2,000 drivers in the U.S. He said that Trump's new order is creating a fear that some drivers will be targeted because of where they're from.

"I think all these rules and regulations are vital to the trucking industry, but on the other hand, are these measures gonna be used against the people of color to retaliate or to discriminate?" Dhillon asked.

Days after Trump's executive order, the Oklahoma state House of Representatives voted in favor of a bill that would fine drivers who can't demonstrate English proficiency.

The U.S. Department of Transportation is expected to issue new guidance on federal English proficiency testing and enforcement within the next 60 days.
